

The Danger of Dominican Crosswalks: A Safety Reminder

Edited by Brooke Vafi, Johanna Markrud, Dominican Services, Campus Welfare

As the new school year begins, the Dominican University campus is filled with students, faculty, and visitors. However, there's an important safety issue that needs attention: the crosswalks around campus can be very dangerous for both students and drivers.

Many students hurry to get to class or meet friends, sometimes distracted by their phones. This can lead to risky situations, especially when drivers aren't paying close attention or are driving too fast. Speeding through these areas makes it harder for drivers to react if someone suddenly steps into the crosswalk without looking both ways.

Reports show an increase in near-misses and accidents at these crossings, highlighting the need for everyone to be more cautious. Drivers need to stick to speed limits and watch for pedestrians, while students should use crosswalks and make sure they're seen before crossing.

One of the most important rules is to always look both ways before crossing the street. This simple action can save lives and help everyone stay safe.
