“ Smart Money ”

Jaylen Allen
Editor of Finance, Weekly Contributor of The Health of Wealth

Do you believe money rules our world? What would you do without it? Or what would you do if you had a lot of it? Simple questions with pretty simple answers, huh? Many might buy some fancy clothes or the newest Mercedes Benz if they happen to stumble across a good fortune. Or buy a huge, luxurious house with an indoor swimming pool and personal valet service, you know, something along those lines. But, what about those who don’t worship fancy cars, expensive clothes or jewelry? What would they do? The answer is also simple. Invest.

Investing is one of those things an old relative or some sketchy social media influencer tries to sell you on. But, truth be told, it is definitely something you should consider if you’re pocketing some extra cash. It is the long game many play to achieve and maintain financial freedom. However, if you can’t trust people on the internet for advice on investing and you don’t want to listen to the drunk uncle that only took one finance course in the 50’s, then where are you supposed to go? Well, for one, I am going to be sharing some useful information our beloved high school teachers once taught us. I know, I can’t believe it either. It’s something called “Finding Credible Source”. Would you look at that, it seems like they did teach a few useful things there after all.

As with everything, you must educate yourself on what is good advice and what is not, evaluate your sources and decide if they are credible or not. But I highly suggest you watch videos on good investing tips as well as talk to others you know that are interested in investing, I’m sure they’ll be happy to lead you in a good direction. And if you’re not ready to jump into investing just yet, no problem. Just reflect back on this idea if you happen to inherit something good from that dunk uncle. Of course, I wouldn’t expect anything in return…wouldn’t hurt you though, eh?