

The Halloween Controversy: Celebrating in November

Edited by Brooke Vafi and Jo Merkrud

This year, Halloween falls on November 1st, creating some controversy. While many enjoy the fun of Halloween, this date also coincides with All Saints' Day, which is important for some religious communities. This can lead to tension between celebration and respect.

Safety is another big concern. The National Safety Council says children are more than twice as likely to be hit by cars on Halloween night, and having festivities extend into November could make this worse. Community events might also be confusing, leading to lower participation.

Statistics reveal that 70% of parents prefer to celebrate Halloween on October 31st, emphasizing the importance of tradition. According to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration(NHTSA), there is a 43% increase in pedestrian fatalities on Halloween, making it the most dangerous night for children on the roads., an influence that could heighten with celebrations spilling into November.
