

The Ravens Dilemma

Author: Tristen Lambert

The Ravens are in a rough spot that they have brought upon themselves.

Lamar

Jackson has been fighting for a new, long-term contract and the Ravens have refused to pay him. This problem has only escalated now that other teams have given record high contracts to their quarterbacks which only reaffirm Lamar's worth. The owner of the Ravens, Steve Biscotti, said himself that the Deshaun Watson guaranteed contract made by the Browns last year "caused us some problems." Now, fast forward to today, Lamar Jackson has requested a trade from the Baltimore Ravens. Jackson said in a tweet "-in regards to my future plans. As of March 2nd, I requested a trade from the Ravens organization for which the Ravens has not been interested in meeting my value, any and everyone that's has met me or been around me know I love the game of football and my dream is to help a team win the super bowl. You all are great but I had to make a business decision that was best for my family and I. No matter how far I go or where my career takes me, I'll continue to be close to my fans of Baltimore Flock nation and the entire State of Maryland. You'll See me again." This is news considering we did not know that he requested a trade for almost an entire month. The future of Lamar in Baltimore is looking less likely each day and as of now, there is little to know speculation on what the Ravens will do about the situation.
