Brody Lange World Soccer

After the first four weeks of the world soccer season, there has been a lot of drama and movement throughout leagues across the globe. All of the top five leagues in the world have seen surprising shakeups in the standings, and some shocking results. However, today commences the first international break of the season where players can leave to join their international teams for training and friendly matches. The biggest headline is the beginning of Jurgen Klopp's reign as German National Team head coach. Germany's world cup campaign ended in tragic fashion losing to Paraguay 4-3 on penalties in the round of 32 which triggered this massive change to German football. As a German and fan of the DFB I found this to be the best move for the future of Germany; to get back to being a global powerhouse like they once were, they needed a change of direction. Klopp has been recognized as one of the best coaches in recent soccer history after he led Dortmund to 5 titles. He led Liverpool to seven titles and implemented a unique and intense style of football that made him and the club loved by millions. His first move as DFB head coach was to name two squads as opposed to one for the upcoming friendly matches. This is unheard of in international football but claims to have a special plan in place to transform German football to the dominant global force they once were. We will see how this new style of play translates come match day. I have trust in the process, but now it's up to Jurgen Klopp and all of Germany to put words into action and bring German football back!
