Jim Harbaugh Hired as LA Chargers' New head Coach.

Shocking news struck the football world this week. The LA Chargers have announced that Jim Harbaugh will be taking over as the new head coach. Speculation ran high about who the chargers would look to after releasing their current head coach, many wondered what Harbaugh would do with his newfound credibility, shortly after winning a national championship at the college level.

Fresh off his perfect season with Michigan, that resulted in a national championship for the Wolverines, Harbaugh was quick to accept the offer to step back into the NFL, a position he is familiar with, having spent a lot of time in the big leagues. "I am honored and thrilled to join the Chargers family," said Harbaugh. "I am eager to work alongside the talented players and coaching staff to build a winning culture and deliver success to the passionate fan base here in Los Angeles."

Now the question remains, is this the right move for the Chargers, or for Harbaugh? There's no doubt that coaching in the NFL is a big accomplishment, but is he biting off more than he can chew? He already had a run in the NFL that led to some success, but ultimately ended coaching college football. Now, this is not saying he's not a great football coach, as it's no small feat to coach a team to a national collegiate championship.

In my opinion, Harbaugh will be a great fit for the chargers' aggressive offense, and smart calculated defense. I believe he will bring the right set of knowledge and experience to the table, possibly enough to give the chargers a shot at their division next year. It will come down to how the chargers fair in the draft, Harbaugh's work with Justin Herbert and how well they spend their time preparing in the offseason.
